BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Air League is celebrating 100 years of dedicated support for British Aviation. Its most important contribution has been the encouragement of the younger generations through its Young Pilots Fund, Flying Scholarships, and Bursaries. In 1937, it established the Air Training Corps, initially as the Air Defence Cadet Corps, which has probably made a greater contribution to air-mindedness in this country than any of its other initiatives.

The Air League has also staunchly supported the British Aerospace industry. This has now become one of our most valuable and technologically advanced sectors and enjoys a world reputation for innovation and quality.

The League has every reason to feel proud of its successes over the last 100 years, and I very much hope that this centenary banquet will, both celebrate 100 years of achievement, and inaugurate a further 100 years of enthusiastic support of aviation and its associated industries.
